

PETA's Undercover Investigators expose another KFC Supplier, 17 May 2007

Another disturbing case of animal abuse has been revealed through a PETA undercover investigation.

The investigator documented cruelty to animals at a Missouri slaughterhouse owned by George's, Inc.—a KFC "Supplier of the Year"—including the following:

- * Workers were throwing live chickens.
- * Metal dumping machines were crushing birds to death.
- * Birds' limbs were impaled on the broken bars of metal cages, and workers were instructed simply to yank the birds out. The investigator also found severed limbs left in cages after they had been emptied.
- * Workers were hitting chickens with metal poles in order to move the birds when they got stuck in the spring-loaded cage doors.

In one morning, PETA's investigator saw roughly 50 "red birds"—chickens who enter scalding-hot defeathering tanks while they are still conscious. Click here to see photos taken during the investigation, read the investigator's log notes, and "interview" the investigator using an interactive video.

It's only with the direct support of caring people that PETA is able to get inside these facilities and expose cruelty to animals in a way that no corporation can reasonably deny. Resources are required to set up undercover operations and expose cruelty to animals.

With your help, we can spread the word about what our investigations have revealed and hold corporations like KFC accountable for their actions. Please support PETA's undercover work with an online donation.

Thank you for your contribution to help animals.

Read more about what PETA's investigation uncovered at KFC "Supplier of the Year" George's, Inc.